> "A person is more than their behaviour."

Sam is a Positive Behaviour Support Practitioner and Director of Allied Progress, with more than two decades of experience supporting children, young people and adults across disability support, residential care, child protection and the not-for-profit sector.

Central to Sam's practice is the belief that a person should never be defined by their behaviour. His experience across disability and child protection has given him a strong understanding of the complex family, service and professional systems that can shape a person's life and support. Sam builds strong relationships with participants and works collaboratively with the people around them to improve understanding, strengthen support and promote a better quality of life.

Sam's approach is also shaped by his experience as a father of three. Being a parent has strengthened his patience, empathy and appreciation of the realities families face, reinforcing the importance of strategies that are practical, achievable and suited to everyday life.
